740 continue Rebellion

In spring of 740 the Romans commenced a savage scorched-earth invasion designed to drive the rebels into submission, devastating fields and burning native settlements as he advanced slowly into the interior.

There was a chronic shortage of Roman supplies and constant sniping from Augustus, there was famine at home and the stepped-up wartime defense expenditures were threatening to empty an already depleted wearing down the rebel's will to fight.

BATO, the Breucian, surrendered to Tiberius, who decided that he could trust him sufficiently to release him and make him King of his tribe. Shortly thereafter however, this BATO (the Breucian) was captured in an ambush laid by BATO (the Dalmatian) who executed the Breucian on the spot. BATO (the Dalmatian) was able to rally the resistance in PANNONIA for a few months but by end of year 8 Tiberius had managed to confine the insurrection to Dalmatia itself.
